ENGLISH TEST N°1

PART ONE: READING FOR COMPREHENSION

Read the text below and do all the activities that follow it on your sheet.

Young adults face specific challenges in a time of transition, which oftentimes leads to experimentation with drugs and alcohol. Those who misuse substances in adolescence are more likely to continue this use into adulthood, so it is important to address the reality of young adults and addiction head on.

The age group starting at 14 years and extending into the mid to 25 is typically the age group to use the most substances, like alcohol, Cocaine, and Marijuana. Being a young adult is a part of life that presents unique challenges. This is often the period of life where people move away from their parents, begin college, enlist in the military, start a career, or start their own family or even live in the family. While everyone has their own path, it is undeniable that young adulthood is a time of transition and sometimes stress. While some people start experimenting with drugs and alcohol in their youth and some hold off until they're older, many begin at this age. This can be due to a desire to experiment, community or environmental pressures, or mental health conditions.

One study found that teens who are homosexuals, sex workers, night-club work or school dropouts are at a higher risk of developing alcohol, drug, or tobacco abuse and dependence than their peers.

Treatment is not only for young people with a full-blown addiction; drug abuse intervention at an early age can be beneficial for a young person experimenting with drugs. There are many options to explore for treatment.
